Graduate Studies

Besides the usual preparation in economics and quantitative methods, I was able to take an additional year of graduate work. The Penn State Interdisciplinary Graduate Program in the Humanities awarded a one-year fellowship making substantial course work outside of economics possible.

In the Interdisciplinary Graduate Program in the Humanities my focus was centered in philosophy of science and cognitive psychology. Courses were taken in each of the following areas: American pragmatism, Peirce, philosophy of science, cognitive psychology, and the history of psychology (2). A course on approaches to interdisciplinary research, required for all pre-doctoral fellows, was taught by the director of the program. Before participating in the Interdisciplinary Program, other graduate courses taken were the metaphysics of Aristotle, aesthetics, and the political philosophy of John Rawls.

In the economics program, I took exams in each of the following fields: micro, macro, monetary theory and policy, income and wealth distribution, and American economic history. Other electives taken were industrial organization, comparative systems, and the history of economic thought. Quantitative preparation consisted of econometrics, mathematical economics, mathematical statistics, Fortran programming, and applied time series analysis.
