Senior Vice Provost for Academic Affairs Vasudevan came to address questions the committee had on the results of the Curran Report. The committee stated that they felt as though hiring a small amount of career advisers would not have a large effect on the hiring rate of UNH students after graduation. The Career Task Force already has their plan in motion and will begin to address their solutions to the Curran report at their next meeting in November. The Student Affairs Committee suggested that it may be a better use of funds to create a "First-Years 101" course that provided students the resources to be successful in their career search. This course would highlight the top skills employers look for in applicants and would point the students to different resources around campus that can help them build these skill sets. The Student Affairs Committee decided to have each member draft up different key points they each though this new class should touch on to bring to the next meeting. This class would be broken down based off of college and a separate section would also be available to graduate students and would be more geared towards their degrees.
