Developing a Thesis

A thesis statement is a complete sentence that articulates the purpose and argument of your paper. Strong thesis statements are specific and limited in scope. They not only give direction to your readers, but also guide your writing process by providing a focus for your research, outlining, and drafting. The thesis statement usually appears in the first or second paragraph of the essay so that readers can follow the argument from the beginning. Often, writers state the thesis in the last sentence of the first paragraph.

Characteristics of a Well-Developed Thesis

It is a statement of an argument rather than a promise or a topic.

A good thesis provides the author with a statement they can defend or argue throughout the body of their paper. Although it does identify the topic that will be written, it also provides a clear stance within a larger argument.

TOPIC: High football salaries.

PROMISE: In this paper, I am going to show that pro football salaries are not too high.

THESIS: Pro football players’ high salaries are justified because they put money into the economy by supporting many people and businesses.

It is specific and extends beyond the immediately apparent.

A well-developed thesis is as specific as possible while still providing sufficient subject matter to work with. It should draw upon your body of evidence and move beyond immediately apparent observations in order to state your own original position on a topic. A specific thesis gives you a precise notion of what you’re going to say about a much broader subject. You may refine your thesis by asking such questions as “Why does this seem to be true?” and “What are the effects of this observation?”

TOO BROAD: Young people are too influenced by the media.

BETTER: The frequent use of unusually thin models in television and magazine advertisements has contributed to the rise of eating disorders among adolescent girls and boys in the United States.
A strong thesis statement is limited so it can give direction to your paper. The thesis statement sets limits on the scope of what you will cover in the paper, so it reflects the contents accurately.

UNLIMITED: Many new drugs are improving cancer treatments.

LIMITED: Increased access to chemotherapy drugs has extended the lives of low-income breast cancer patients in Boston.

UNLIMITED: Bourgeois society is frivolous.

LIMITED: In JD Salinger’s Catcher in the Rye, Holden’s descriptions of his encounters with the wealthy depict the bourgeois’ society as frivolous.

Creating a Thesis Statement

1. Figure out your stance on the issue at hand. You might do this by articulating questions you have about the topic. Your thesis may arise through the process of answering these questions.
2. How do you feel about this topic? What about it do you think caused that reaction? How might you turn your gut reactions or initial opinions into an evidenced argument?
3. Mark the passages in your source material, research, freewriting, or notes that pertain to your topic. What patterns do you see? What questions are raised that your thesis might answer?
4. Once you have a basic stance, think about expanding and redefining it. Why is this so? In what cases? What are some examples?

Writing with a Thesis Statement

1. Mark the passages in your source material, research, freewriting, notes, or rough draft that support your position.
2. Create an outline for your essay using your thesis statement as a guide.
3. No matter what thesis statement you develop, you will need enough relevant information (research, lab reports, textual evidence, etc.) to support it credibly and clearly. As you write and revise, check your thesis statement often to see if you have drifted away from it. It is important that each paragraph relate closely to the thesis statement.

Keep in mind that your argument might change during the drafting process. If this is the case, you will need to adjust your thesis so it still aligns with your new argument.